[4] Water (WR)

Water Recycling Program Implementation is the process of implementing a water reuse program.

The program may include the collection, treatment, and reuse of wastewater for various purposes such as irrigation, building maintenance, or even drinking water production. This helps to reduce the burden on natural water resources and improve the environmental situation.

The implementation of such a program requires careful planning, the development of technical solutions, as well as cooperation with local authorities and the public. It is important to analyze the current situation with water use, determine the goals and objectives of the program, select appropriate treatment technologies and develop an action plan.

The implementation of a water reuse program may require investments in infrastructure and equipment, but in the long term it can lead to significant resource savings and environmental improvements.

[4.2] Water Recycling Program Implementation

University water supply scheme (UzSWLU)

Description:

The University's water supply system includes the following elements:

- water supply networks;
- pumping stations;
- water storage tanks;
- water filtration and purification systems.

The university's water supply is provided by the municipal water supply system. The water passes through a filtration system, where mechanical impurities and other contaminants are removed. Then the water enters the reservoirs, from where it is distributed throughout the university building using pumping stations.
